First, the data is decomposed into its principal components by using the covariance matrix. Then, the principal components are analyzed and filtered with noise reduction methods. Noise reduction is based on the zero-crossing criterion which we previously proposed for estimating the envelope waveform of the cardiac pulse signal. The result is that the estimated envelope signal is given as the noise-reduced signal plus a linear combination of sine and cosine functions. This sine/cosine combination has a unique form which is independent of the choice of filters and data-processing algorithms. Furthermore, the combination coefficients can be estimated automatically by this method. Finally, the acceleration coefficient of the heart signal is estimated by a modification of our previous method. This improvement enables us to estimate the acceleration factor accurately for any heart signal with
